Another important finding was the obvious discrepancy in the prevalence of IBS between males and females, which could be explained by the fact that the prevalence of both IBS and IR is higher in females than in males \[@b26\]. As a result, the difference in FINS and TNF- α levels between the IBS and the control groups would have been more obvious, which may have led to a potential increase in the FINS or TNF- α levels in the IBS group. A further important finding of our study was that there was no significant difference in the TNF- α levels between the FMS and IR groups. However, we observed a positive correlation between FINS and TNF- α in the FMS group. Because IBS is often accompanied by FMS \[@b15], [@b25], [@b27]\], it is likely that the FINS and TNF- α levels in the FMS group were higher than those in the IBS group. Several limitations of our study must be considered when interpreting the findings. First, we could not investigate the relationship between FINS and TNF- α in healthy people, because no healthy participants were recruited in the present study. Second, we did not investigate the interactions between FINS and TNF- α . There is evidence that TNF- α levels can be influenced by other factors, including menstrual status, BMI, stress, and dietary habits \[@b28]--[@b30]. However, our study is the first to investigate the relationship between the levels of FINS and TNF- α in the general population. In conclusion, the present study provides evidence that FINS and TNF- α have an additive effect on IR in the general population. IR is associated with increased risk of IBS in the general population, and the increased prevalence of IBS in males and females could be 82157476af
